Hi Bob, In light of the most recent child molestation allegations involving Bobby Dodd, I've been asked to write a story that shows how the world of sports is examining the issue of child sexual abuse via athletics participation. Are athletic directors reviewing procedures with coaches on who can meet with young athletes in non-profits or what the procedures are for screening coaches or for allowing children to be brought to university facilities outside of activities they are involved in? I'd like to know if the NCAA is forming any committees to discuss or review and if Mark is available to talk about what should be done from a collegiate perspective. I'm not sure where the line is between this being a school issue or an NCAA issue, or whether the NCAA simply has a leadership role to encourage and help organize some discussion or guidelines. I'm sure Mark has been thinking about this. I dare say this is starting to sound a little like the Catholic Church mess. Every couple days something else is coming up. Can we talk Monday morning and can you check with Mark, please? Thanks. Curtis Eichelberger, Bloomberg News This email and any attachments may contain NCAA confidential and privileged information.
